1. In Volcano Princess, the player character is the father and the daughter, and the player can choose what their name is. As the father, the primary task is to raise the daughter and establish the image of a father in her eyes, whether that image is positive or negative. As the daughter, the player can construct e her personality throughout gameplay, whether it is positive or negative. The daughter is an avatar in the game; the player can choose what path or personality she is going. But the father is not, the player mostly just uses the father's perspective to raise the daughter.

For the main storyline, it is the events that forcing the characters along. As player playing along, they can't control when will the main storyline will be up. But for the other lines, like the relationship lines, the player can control their favorability and predict the special events that will happen.

The interaction between the character and the player is very strong. Because the player is controlling the daughter to do what and go where, it depends on the player to build her personality. I would say that this way of interaction is perfect for this game, because this interaction fits the game's purpose, which is raising a daughter and enjoying the process of it.

2. The two NPCs are the mother and the angel. In this game, only the daughter has a little voice acting(it is in Chinese and it is really bad, because it doesn't have feeling at all); the others only have modal particles.

The mother and the daughter have a familial and protector, which is like a dependent relationship in the storyline. Because the mother, as the god of the Volcano country, was protecting and saving her daughter in her own way. It is pretty obvious based on her outfit. She is dressed in pure white clothes and has long yellow hair, often with a smile in the early scene(in the father's flashback/dream), but she also looks sick during the early scene, which means that she is definitely hiding something.

The angel is like a mirror to the daughter. Based on the outfit, it is the same as the young version of the daughter; the player can definitely infer that something is going on between the angel and the daughter. At the end, the player can know that the angel is the sister of the daughter.

3. The primary antagonist is Lebsa. She is the head of a prestigious family. However, she was adopted; over the years as her daughter grew up, she rapidly rose to power thanks to her exceptional abilities, which made her look suspicious at first time. She is also a professor at the school; the daughter can choose her as a tutor at the school. But she is more like an "undercover agent"—seemingly righteous on the surface, yet secretly craving power.

Her appearance suggests she embodies a darker side—short black hair, a black-and-red outfit, and an eye patch covering part of her face. She was a bit intimidating at first, which is why I didn't choose her as my mentor. Her appearance changes later on; she removes the eye patch, revealing her crimson eyes. If the player achieves the "True

Ending," she transforms into the deceased former Hero, a figure who craved the power of the gods. specifically, that of his mother and his other sister, which goes against the daughter. Lebsa’s motives for her villainy are clear and well-founded; her actions are driven by a craving for divine power, a desire that directly ties into the central conflict between mother and daughter. While her motivations are relatively straightforward, they align perfectly with the game’s grand themes of family, power, and the inheritance of divine might.
